

When Age Was Victorious

By Anna Eichberg King

Across the narrow street, paved with cobblestones, among the grass sprouted, stood the old brick church with its solitary gable surmounted by a pedimented bell tower. When the bell tolled, Miss Penrose's abode across the way vibrated, and so did the doughnuts on the baker's counter underneath. For Miss Penrose lived over the bakeshop.

When the rickety depot carriage swung up before Miss Penrose's house, Aurora, within it, sat looking about in speechless rapture. The ancient hackman climbed down from his perch and breathed in upon her an air of mingled whiskey and peace.

"You're here, men," he said, and Aurora looked at him with such an engaging smile that he coughed confidentially behind a very dirty hand and added, "She do have the queerest folks come visitin'. One's own no a quarter two years ago August. He writes poetry. I wouldn't have her know for nothin'!" and he released her. Aurora flew up the narrow stairs.

"The old Aurora and the young Aurora!" and she was held at arm's length, and the old Aurora looked at her with critical eyes just a little weary.

"I wouldn't mind being old if I were as distinguished as you are," and young Aurora, blushing into a low chair and sighing with joy, it was a queer curving room with five windows full of plants. There was a littered desk and a low table beside a couch, and on the wall a hearth with a fire blazing with green and scarlet and golden flames, and the eastern sun flickered through the vines at the windows.

"What a heavenly place!" young Aurora repeated.

"Wait till you see my workshop! Now come to your room. Ah, child, I'm glad you have come! I need your help. You see I had nearly forgotten that I was growing old."

From the balcony of Miss Penrose's workshop you could look down the winding river just past the Whiffy light-house to the ocean.

Miss Penrose proclaimed her supreme indifference to the social amenities when she moved into the old house on the wharf with a bakeshop underneath, which flavored the atmosphere with doughnuts.

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particularly agreeable one. "You must have been a very fascinating woman," she said. "I am sure many men have been in love with you."

"Not just with me, child, but with my mind. Nevertheless, it's very kind of you. There, run down and see if that baker's counter underneath the bakeshop is clean. Miss Penrose leaned back among the red cushions and stared down the river.

"Dear aunt, here is a letter—such an interesting hand."

A faint blush crept into Miss Penrose's face. "It should be, for it is from Roger Lythgoe."

"Not the poet?" and young Aurora's eyes were round with wonder and reverence.

"Yes, the great Roger Lythgoe," Miss Penrose took the letter, but she looked absently at the girl. "Aurora, if I could have a wish fulfilled it would be to you to look like you."

"But aunt, dear, think of your mind and mine—how so commonplace."

"I know it," and Miss Penrose opened the letter. Young Aurora had a modest opinion of her own mind, to see, she told. "Aunt Aurora, how I should like to see him! I never saw a real poet."

"He is like a real poet," and Miss Penrose's mouth opened sharply out.

"Oh, how beautiful!" Then Aurora's face fell. "But he wouldn't notice me!"

"You're right," said Miss Penrose. "But he would notice you if you were as beautiful as you are now. You see, I never saw him."

"Never saw him?"

"He came once two years ago, but I had no chance with you about—commonplace me!" The wind was fluttering the skirt of her white gown and she caught her breath. "But tell me, what is Mr. Lythgoe like?"

"He writes that he is the homeliest man ever made. Are you preparing to meet him?"

Miss Penrose laughed, but there was a sharp ring in her voice.

"Miss Penrose sat at her desk writing and Aurora watered the plants. She put each on the window-sill and deluged it most unfeelingly. The house vibrated as the old church across the way boomed the hour.

"If you wish to respect time, have it measured off," said Miss Penrose. "The bell says an hour is dead; it will never come back again."

"I shall buy the house from the baker if I can," Miss Penrose said to Aurora, "and I mean to live here and die here. You will inherit after I am cremated—remember, I wish to be cremated!" and she paused in the washing of her brushes. She had on a long calico, paint-spattered pinafore and there was a tired look in her face. On the easel stood her last work, a sunlit landscape with apples in blossom and a pool reflecting the spring sky—and there was a touch of child in the splendor of the sky.

"You see, it is the youth of the year," she explained, "and youth is always a bit cruel."

"Please don't!"

"Don't what, child?"

"Talk of dying, and Aurora shivered.

"Why not? It is the most interesting experience in life—the only experience each makes for himself. Sometimes I long for the time, I am a little tired of my own body," she said. "It has stood between me and happiness."

Aurora stared at her aunt. "To be tired of one's own body—it was beyond her. The young Aurora's body was a particu-

NEARLY EVERYTHING GOES IN BOUNTIFUL

Attempted Enforcement of the Smallpox Quarantine Said to Be Glaring Failure.

Everything goes in Bountiful, from polyanthi to smallpox, and the enforcement of law in regard to the one as lax as the quarantine of the other. There are today not less than thirty to thirty-five cases of smallpox in the village of Bountiful, and the end is not in sight.

More Boys and Matches. Fire damaged the one-story, frame tool house of George Culler and T. Buckley at 835-39 Second East street, to the extent of $15. Monday evening. The fire was caused by boys playing in the tool house with matches. Chief Glore and the apparatus from headquarters responded.

A private safe may be rented in the fire and burglar-proof vaults of the Salt Lake Security and Trust Company, 32 Up, Main street, $2.00 per year.

INTERESTING MEETING HELD BY SOCIALISTS

At the regular Monday night meeting of the local Socialist organization, at the quarters in the Commercial club building, the Rev. William Thurston Brown made a report of the doings of the national Socialist convention at Chicago, May 15-21.

The Rev. Mr. Brown said that the question of woman suffrage came up for consideration and that the convention decided that if the women Socialists wanted to take up the movement they should do it as individuals, irrespective of the organization.

Mrs. William Thurston Brown said that there was a well defined movement on foot toward the organization of a Socialist Sunday school that would be free of all sectarian dictation. It is likely that this Sunday school will be organized soon.

Next Tuesday night the Socialists of the city will meet to elect delegates to the convention to be held in this city July 24.

THROWING BASEBALL AT MONKEY STOPPED

When Proprietor of Game Declines to Change Places With the Animal.

Throwing baseballs at a monkey in the Moose carnival on Walker's field Monday night caused a number of indignant persons to call the police station and ask that the strange sport be stopped. Lieutenant Shannon sent Motorcycle Patrolman Dan Grundvig to the grounds to investigate the case. On his report orders were issued by Lieutenant Shannon to stop the game.

When Motorcycle Patrolman Grundvig arrived at the field he found a monkey in a pit and a number of persons engaged in throwing baseballs at the animal. The man who ran the game was charging 5 cents for two throws at the monkey. He was doing a league game business. The equity of the monkey saved him from being killed by the balls which came speeding past his head. His frantic endeavors to evade the baseballs were pathetic. When Patrolman Grundvig reported the matter to Lieutenant Shannon the following order was issued:

"You tell the owner of that game he must stop it instantly or we will put him in jail. The department fails to see the humor in tossing baseballs at a defenseless monkey caged in a cage. Nor will the department allow it. If the owner of the game wants to put the monkey at the bench selling the tickets for the baseballs and take the monkey's place in the game the game can go on. Otherwise he must stop the game."

The game stopped.

ANOTHER TWO DAYS FOR COMPANIES TO PAY

The original assessment made on corporations for the internal revenue collector for this district, which includes Utah, Idaho and Montana, amounted to $250,000, of which amount only $70,000 has been paid and most of that under protest.

The tax is payable on or before June 30. If the tax is not paid by that date, the corporation is liable for an added 5 percent on the tax due and 1 percent interest for each thirty days it remains unpaid. Evidently the corporations are going to fight the new law to a finish.

Barn Damaged by Fire.

Fire, caused by boys smoking, damaged the barn of Frank Fairbanks, 1283 Eleventh East street, Monday afternoon, to the extent of $150. Chief Glore and the apparatus from station No. 5 responded. The fire was caused by boys smoking. The barn was in danger until the arrival of the department, which soon had water placed on the roofs of the adjoining buildings.

Hart Gets Four Months.

William A. Hart, charged with exhibiting a deadly weapon, namely, a razor, before Judge Bowman Monday, and was sentenced to serve four months in the county jail. Hart, while in an advanced state of intoxication, attempted to enter Saltair Sunday night and, when refused entrance, drew his revolver and threatened to kill Deputy Sheriff Bert Somers and Claude Russell and a bystander. He was finally overpowered and taken to the county jail.

"Fourth of July" Specials

Every person wants to be well dressed on the Fourth. Here's your opportunity, even though you haven't a fat purse.

Hundreds of Great Bargains

This announcement will be welcomed by hundreds of Salt Lake people who appreciate an opportunity of saving upon clothing and furnishings always needed just before a holiday.

We announce a "Fourth of July" Special Sale upon our entire stock, and beginning this morning the same reductions as we made during the great Bargain Carnival will be made. The goods are still upon the counters arranged the same as during the sale, and we are making this sale partly to avoid the necessity of putting these summer goods back into the boxes.

In addition to reductions of 30c, 40c and 50c on the dollar upon our entire stock, we have marked many broken lines even 10% to 20% lower.

Our stock contains clothing, furnishings, hats, shoes, etc., for men, women and children in the best materials and newest styles, and now, just before the great National Holiday, when everybody wants good clothes, we make reductions that are in many cases lower than the cost to us.

Come in today and look at the remarkable reductions. Imagine saving a third, half or even more upon fine goods such as we sell.

Special Prices Go Into Effect Today

Every Department Stands Its Share of Bargains.

18 and 20 EAST FIRST STREET

The Tribune Gives Your Wants the Largest Circulation